Sorta like when they rebooted Supes with the 1998' Batman series. This actually makes sense as I didn't really check much of the later years of TOS when I was watching the show, unless I found someone who was still watching them. _____ "No heart have I, and no soul, for the fight, but to deal shrewd blows with my blade, and on my knee watch the ring, and call you all to the dance."Q: Inlinescripts of form validation I am building a simple small form for user registration (among other things, but not the focus of this question). Q: Objective C synthesise breakpoint loses static variable I have a class named Sock that implements a static variable. class Sock : NSObject { static UInt8 last = 0; } When I debug my project I set the breakpoint with lldb and set a breakpoint on main. Then in lldb, type "p Sock" and I get the correct value of last. I then go back into my code and add a breakpoint and set the breakpoint to Sock. class Sock : NSObject { static UInt8 last = 0; static BOOL init() { ... } } When I do the same thing and type "p Sock" in lldb it is incorrect. I have added a breakpoint inside init and also inside the init in Sock and still the value of last is not correct. I suspect there is something in the linker and when I do not set a breakpoint then I do not access the static variable from outside of the linker scope and the debugger and lldb are both accessing the static variable before it is set and the debugger has access to it after the object has been sent to the linker. A: You are correct that for static variables, the debugger and linker has access to the variable before the object is linked. That is the point of having accessors in the first place. Your error is a little more subtle. When you print in your debugger, it looks for local variables with your current location. For global or static variables, you must include '_' or 'self' for the linker to find the variable. Try this: `print(Socket._last)` or `print(self._last)` I expect this should work. After a trial period during which their commission for the Virginlink data network was to expire, a bill that has been floating around the British parliament for years has finally been passed into law, meaning that the UK's operators will be able to charge more for broadband access, as they see fit. The so-called Digital Economy Bill, passed through the House of Commons in May, was designed to offer an "augmented" version of the BT Openreach network, essentially extending fiber to 95% of Britain's homes with 1 G
